1 Data Description

Background: As part of a planned evaluation of New York City’s proposed soda portion cap policy, we collected information on the availability, sizing, promotion, and cost of beverages in the fast food restaurants we visited in NYC and NJ, as well as their nearest convenience stores/bodegas and supermarkets. These data are intended to complement receipt data, point-of-purchase surveys, and telephone-based dietary recalls for a fuller picture of the factors that may influence beverage purchases. Baseline data collection was conducted in three waves: Wave 1 began in early January 2013 and ended in April 2013; Wave 2 was conducted from August to November 2013; and Wave 3 was conducted between January and June 2014.

Sample and Data Collection: We visited 40 restaurants, convenience stores, and supermarkets to conduct environmental scans (some stores and restaurants were visited multiple times to evaluate inter-rater reliability). Scans were completed using a version of the Nutrition Environment in Stores (NEMS) environmental scan, created by Karen Glanz at the University of Pennsylvania to assess the retail environment specific to beverages (NEMS-B). The full NEMS-B survey tool is extensive, with 1,800+ variables. Provided here is an abbreviated data set for fast food restaurants and convenience stores/bodegas of 414 variables that cover availability and sizing of sugar sweetened beverages, low/no-calories beverages, and bottled water, as well as signage promoting these beverages. These variables are key to computing a NEMS-B score (scoring is in revisions/beta testing as of September 2015) representing the healthfulness of the beverage environment. A data set for supermarkets, with 153 variables, is also included for researchers. Contact Jessica Athens, Jessica.Athens@nyumc.org, for more information.

Data Structure: The NEMS location variable (`nemslocationindicator`) can be used to merge supermarket NEMS data with fast food/convenience store NEMS data, as well as receipt and survey data sets.
